Associate

Radia Amina Djouaher joined the Lavery team as a student in the summer of 2021. She is part of the Business Law team and practices mainly in transactional and commercial law.

During her articling term, Amina had the opportunity to collaborate on multiple technology law cases and played a key role, for instance, in the due diligence process for complex deals involving global technology companies. What's more, Amina actively participated in drafting contracts involving technology.

Using the experience she gained at the firm, Amina contributed to creating Lavery's white paper on what actions to take before, during and after a cyber incident. She also helped clients strengthen their cyber resilience by developing or delivering cybersecurity training content.

As a McGill University law student, Amina deepened her knowledge in this area of law by taking a course on legal issues in cybersecurity.

She looks forward to further developing her business law skills while leveraging her interest and passion for technology law.
