The Regulation¹ specifying the new obligations of Bill 96² was published in the Gazette officielle du Québec on June 26, 2024. It modifies the current Regulation respecting the language of commerce and business.³ These changes were expected considering the questions raised by the passage of Bill 96 in June 2022, which required clarification. In this bulletin, we will discuss issues related to the use of trademarks in connection with products, commercial publications, public signs and posters, and commercial advertising.

Exception for recognized trademarks

Good news! The Regulation reintroduces the exception for “recognized” trademarks,⁴ within the meaning of the Trademarks Act. Common law trademarks and trademarks registered with the Canadian Intellectual Property Office (“CIPO”) may be used without a French version, provided that no French version of the trademark appears in the Register.

By regulation, the government has extended the scope of the exception to trademarks. Under Bill 96 it was to apply only to CIPO-registered trademarks. It has been extended to also cover common law trademarks. With this amendment, the government has made the rules around trademarks more consistent, whether they are used in connection with products, commercial publications or public signs and posters.

It is still recommended to register your trademarks to protect your rights, but registration is no longer a condition for compliance with applicable regulations.

Obligation to translate generic and descriptive terms included in trademarks

The *Charter of the French language*⁵ (the “Charter”) stipulates that any inscription on a product, its container or its wrapping must be in French, and that no inscription in another language may be given greater prominence than that in French or be available on more favourable terms.

The Regulation confirms that the term “product” includes its container, packaging and any accompanying documents or objects.⁶

The Regulation also clarifies the scope of the obligation to translate descriptions and generic terms included in trademarks:

“Description” and “generic term”: A description refers to one or more words describing the characteristics of a product, while a generic term describes the nature of a product, excluding the name of the enterprise and the name of the product as sold.⁷ Designations of origin and distinctive names of a cultural nature are not considered a description or a generic term.

In all likelihood, the reference to the “name of the product as sold” refers to the product’s main trademark. The obligation to translate generic terms or descriptions contained in the trademark would not apply to the main trademarks under which the product is sold.

Thus, according to the example provided by the Quebec government, there would be no need to translate into French the descriptions or generic terms included in the main trademark BestSoap, as illustrated below.

The infographic illustrates the required changes to a product label. On the left, a bottle labeled 'BestSoap' with 'Pear and lavender' and 'Moisturizing hand soap' is marked with a red 'X', indicating it is non-compliant. On the right, the same bottle is marked with a green checkmark, indicating compliance. The compliant label includes the English text 'BestSoap', 'Pear and lavender', 'Moisturizing hand soap', and 'Seven hydrating pour les mains', along with a small illustration of a pear and a lavender flower. The French text 'Moisturizing hand soap' and 'Seven hydrating pour les mains' is also present, along with a small illustration of a pear and a lavender flower. The text 'Kills 99.9% of bacteria and deeply moisturizes' is also present.

The question also arises regarding secondary trademarks, which are often used to designate a specific product within a range of products. Can we say that such a secondary trademark qualifies as a "name of the product as sold," in addition to the main trademark? Unfortunately, the guide published by the Office québécois de la langue française ("OQLF") does not provide any clarity on this matter, while the text of the Regulation appears broad enough to allow for such an argument depending on the circumstances. In our opinion, such an argument could be made in some cases, but we will need to await the position of the OQLF (or a court decision) for more certainty on this issue.

The Regulation specifies that the French translation of the generic terms or descriptions included in trademarks must appear in French on the product or on a medium permanently attached to the product.⁸ However, it does not provide a definition of "a medium permanently attached to the product." It will be interesting to see how practice develops in this area, and how the OQLF interprets this notion.

Keep in mind the Charter's principle that no inscription in another language should be available on more favourable terms. Companies opting for the medium option will need to ensure not only the permanence of the medium, but also its availability, under conditions that are at least as favourable.

It should also be noted that the size of the French translation of generic terms and descriptions included in a trademark is not specifically addressed in the Regulation. However, the OQLF website specifies that no generic term or description in another language should take precedence over that appearing in French; the OQLF thus seems to apply the general rule contained in the Charter.⁹ This means that the French text must be at least equivalent in size and appearance to that in another language, so that the latter is not predominant.

Transitional period: The Regulation allows a two-year grace period to give businesses time to comply with the above requirements. Until June 1, 2027, any product that does not comply with these new requirements may continue to be distributed, retailed, leased, offered for sale or lease, or otherwise offered on the market, whether in return for payment or free of charge, provided (i) it was manufactured before June 1, 2025, and (ii) no corresponding French version of the recognized trademark has been registered in the Canadian trademark register by June 26, 2024.¹⁰

Although it will still be necessary to make every effort to comply with obligations, this measure ensures that existing non-compliant products can be liquidated.

Commercial publications

The Regulation makes no changes to the rules governing commercial publications, such as catalogues, brochures, folders, commercial directories and other similar publications. The exception applicable to "recognized" trademarks, which had not been amended in Bill 96 or in the draft regulations, remains unchanged. Common law trademarks and trademarks registered with CIPO may be used without a French version, provided that no French version has been registered.

Contrary to what had been envisaged in the draft regulations, websites and social media are not expressly named as commercial publications whose French version must be available on terms that are at least as favourable as any version in another language. To date, the interpretation adopted and applied by the OQLF and the courts is that websites and social media are considered commercial publications and must therefore follow the same rules. Nevertheless, we will remain watchful to see if the lack of explicit reference in the Regulation to websites and social media is of any significance, and if the OQLF will consider changes to its approach to these two types of communication.

Advertising and public signs and posters

It is well known that the Charter requires public signs and posters and commercial advertising in Quebec to be in French. They may be both in French and in another language provided that French is markedly predominant.¹¹

The “recognized” trademark exception also applies to public signs and posters and commercial advertising. Thus, common law trademarks and CIPO-registered trademarks may be used without a French version, if there is no corresponding French version in the Canadian trademark register.¹²

For public signs and posters visible from outside premises, the rule of “sufficient presence” of French gives way to that of the “clear predominance” of French, when the trademark or business name is in a language other than French, in whole or in part.¹³

Public signage visible from outside premises includes not only the exterior of a building, but also premises inside a shopping centre.¹⁴ In such cases, a trademark or company name in a language other than French must be accompanied by a generic term, a description of the goods or services concerned, or a slogan, in French.¹⁵ This trademark or company name visible on a storefront or inside a shopping centre will be considered in the overall visual impact of the premises. For the same visual field, text written in French has much greater impact when (i) the French text occupies a space at least twice as large as that devoted to text in another language, and (ii) its legibility and permanent visibility are at least equivalent to that of text in another language.¹⁶

Finally, as concerns digital signage with alternating French and non-French text, the French text is considered to have a much greater visual impact when it is visible for at least twice as long as the non-French text.¹⁷

Note that there is no grace period for public signs and posters. Companies therefore have until June 1, 2025, to comply with the new rules.

part:

French must be clearly predominant, taking into account the space allotted to the trademark or company name; and the trademark or company name must be accompanied by French terms, in particular a generic term, a description of the products or services, or a slogan.

For the same visual space, the space allotted to French text must be at least twice as large as that devoted to text in another language, and its legibility and permanent visibility must be at least equivalent to that of text in another language.
